Welcome to your Lyric
Dear Lyric Community,

It is hard to believe that Lyric Opera of Chicago has not presented The Daughter of the Regiment in nearly 50 years. We’re long overdue for this highly popular, delightful work by Gaetano Donizetti to return to Lyric’s repertoire. We are thrilled to be bringing Laurent Pelly’s internationally acclaimed production to Chicago for the first time.

Our line-up is a mix of old friends and new. Leading the way is the remarkable Lisette Oropesa, making her long-awaited Lyric debut in the glittering title role. At her side, playing Tonio, is one of Lyric’s favorite stars, the dazzling Lawrence Brownlee, returning to our house in one of the virtuosic showpieces he owns like no one else. Alessandro Corbelli, the great comic baritone, has been charming audiences both at Lyric and across the world with his dazzling patter and superb bel canto singing throughout his long and celebrated career. Sulpice marks his 10th role at Lyric—and he’ll return later this season for Cinderella. It is a delight to once again experience his mixture of vocal virtuosity and comedic timing, the key components that make these comedies shine.

Making her Lyric podium debut is Speranza Scappucci, who is enjoying a major international career, with a wide repertoire including a specialization in bel canto. In the 2025/26 Season, she will become principal guest conductor of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

And, of course, we welcome you, whether old friend or new, to this second production in our season of tremendous variety. After a high-seas Wagnerian drama to open the season, we follow with this laugh-out-loud, high-Cs comedy. Many thanks, as always, for all that you do to help bring our wide-ranging art form to life.

Enjoy the rollicking fun and vocal fireworks!

With its innovative SoundShirt program, Lyric leads the way into a new realm of accessibility.

By David Zivan

“I’m always interested in what technology can do for people,” says Brad Dunn, Lyric’s Senior Director of Digital Initiatives and Interim Head of Marketing and Communications. “My framework is, it either needs to solve a problem or to provide some delight and enjoyment and learning.” It’s no surprise that Dunn has led the way on the company’s newest accessibility initiative, the SoundShirt—a pilot program that checks both those aspirational boxes. An immersive new technology, the SoundShirt is a garment, worn like a jacket, that brings the power of touch to live opera. Audience members, particularly those people who are deaf or hard of hearing, will experience the music being played as real-time vibrations. It is the only such program of its kind in the field of opera.

“I am proud that Lyric Opera of Chicago will be the first opera company in the world to bring this new technology to its live audiences,” says Anthony Freud, Lyric’s General Director, President & CEO. “The SoundShirt reinforces Lyric’s commitment to accessibility and to broadening the impact of our live performances on all audience members.”

Designed and built by London-based CuteCircuit, the SoundShirt program is launching in partnership with the City of Chicago’s Mayor’s Office for People with Disabilities, led by Rachel Arfa, commissioner of Chicago’s Mayor’s Office for People with Disabilities, who was among the garment’s first testing cohort.
Disabilities (MOPD), with support from the Patrick G. and Shirley W. Ryan Innovation Initiative and in part by a grant from the League of Chicago Theatres and ComEd.

Following extensive testing and refinements in the 2022/23 Season, the program had its maiden voyage during a performance of Wagner’s The Flying Dutchman, the opening production for 2023/24. The initial reception has been extraordinarily positive. “It was such a wonderful experience,” said one audience member. “My first time using a jacket that had vibration. I’m excited to see where this product goes.”

SoundShirt wearers experience the feeling of music rendered on their upper body through a process known as haptic actuation—technology familiar to many, due to the vibrations most cell phones can produce. While the orchestra and artists perform in the pit and on stage, microphones capture their sound and transform it into a digital feed for the SoundShirt wearers. (In the theater itself, there is generally no amplification of any kind.) Computer software transforms this closed-circuit audio feed into touch data that is then broadcast wirelessly to the SoundShirts in real time with the performance. Different instruments and voices map to different locations across the body and sleeves of the garment, creating a deepened multisensory experience for operagoers.

Rachel Arfa, the commissioner of MOPD (and the first deaf person to hold the role), helped give the technology a tryout last season. She noted recently that she had arrived to the opera house with a great deal of skepticism—she has seen many different kinds of technological attempts to mirror the sensation of music—but was pleasantly surprised at the results.

“The SoundShirt gave me access to the sound of the performance in a way I have never experienced before, and it honestly made my experience at Lyric even more richly satisfying,” she says. “Chicago has long been known for its embrace of innovation and for its spirit of inclusiveness, so it is fitting that this technology is being piloted by one of our city’s—and the world’s—most important cultural institutions.”

The journey to bring that experience to life in the audience was multifaceted, to say the least, involving not just technical challenges, but complex artistic and experiential considerations.

“The software has eight audio channels, so we have seven microphones in the orchestra, and then we take a single feed of the stage mics,” Dunn notes. While that main audio feed from the stage is always in place (to keep offstage performers and backstage personnel apprised of the live action), setting up the equipment for the rest of the SoundShirt signal presented a puzzle. Head Audio Technician Nick Charlan and Audio Technician Matt Swiatkowski from Lyric’s Technical department were instrumental in finding wireless frequencies that would help the SoundShirt system avoid the numerous other signals swirling in the theater, and rigging the new microphones so as not to interfere with regular performance activities.

Dunn then began the painstaking process of determining where on the shirts the various sounds of live opera would be manifested as vibration. That task was further complicated by the fact that the full complement of singers and orchestra only play all together on Lyric’s main stage during final rehearsals for each production.

As it happens, Dunn polished the settings in as diverse a crucible as you could imagine; the garments were first ready for full live-testing last season during the rehearsal process for Bizet’s Carmen, followed by Lyric’s world-premiere work Proximity, and then the classic American musical West Side Story—works quite different from one another.

“There were essentially two buckets of things to consider,” Dunn recalls. “There’s the technology. One of the first hurdles we had to overcome was the fact there’s just a lot of wireless signal flying around a theater—public wifi, wireless headsets for backstage personnel, and so on. We had to be sure that the connection to the SoundShirts would be seamless—just a few, undetectable milliseconds of lag time.”
Then there is the equally invisible, though more abstract question: What is music supposed to feel like?

“Refining the quality of the experience is critical,” Dunn says. “I actually began my career as a sound engineer, so I can’t think of any word other than ‘mix.’ But instead of mixing the sound output, I’m mixing the amount of intensity to different haptic motors in the shirt. It’s a bunch of pretty boring stuff to many, but we worked extensively with CuteCircuit to add features to their software to help us manage the wide dynamic range of classical music, and to update the frequencies on which the hardware transmits. By the end of Carmen, I actually was very optimistic about the experience of the shirts.”

Further testing, especially with people who are deaf or hard of hearing, continued to refine the settings—and the process will be ongoing. The brass sound in Donizetti’s The Daughter of the Regiment is, after all, different from the brass in Wagner’s The Flying Dutchman.

“What we’re seeking is an enhancement; we’re not recreating what it’s like to hear music, because you can’t do that for someone who doesn’t have their hearing,” Dunn says. “But you can create an experience that is unique, that is a thing in and of itself, that layers on top of the audience’s experience of seeing a show. It adds some richness.”

Increasing access to opera is an ongoing priority across all departments at Lyric. Tickets for SoundShirt seats are currently available for $20, though nearly all other accessibility services are complimentary. The company offers seating for those in wheelchairs, FM and Telecoil loop assisted listening devices, touch tours, audio-described performances, braille and large-print programs, high-powered opera glasses, accessible restrooms, automatic exterior doors, and other benefits. Even the recent large-scale reseating and house renovation was undertaken with an eye toward accessibility.

Like the SoundShirt, many of those improvements started at a modest scale. At present, a small collection of shirts is available, in medium and large, with more sizes on the way. They will be deployed at selected performances of each opera this season, on dates also featuring projected English titles or sign language interpretation.

“I don’t think I made the opera house a destination necessarily in the way that I would now,” Arfa noted. “Because the SoundShirt provides a new experience and makes people curious.”

Donizetti’s The Daughter of the Regiment is bel canto opera’s equivalent of vintage champagne. Marie, the lovable, irrepressible, spirited heroine—a foundling, raised by soldiers—loves handsome Tonio. Things get complicated when the Marquise carts her off to refine her with a “proper” education. In one exhilarating number after another, Marie throws off coloratura flourishes like shooting stars, while her tenor sweetheart pops out nine high-Cs in a single aria! Bel canto superstar Lawrence Brownlee and comedic veteran Alessandro Corbelli partner with the dazzling Lisette Oropesa in her eagerly awaited Lyric debut. The marvelously stylish Speranza Scappucci conducts Laurent Pelly’s quick-witted, uproarious production.

ACT I
Marie was found as a baby on a battlefield, and raised as the “daughter” of the 21st Regiment. Her foster-father Sulpice has decreed she must marry a soldier from the Regiment, but Marie has other ideas: She has fallen in love with the Tyrolean peasant Tonio.

Caught up in the conflict between the French and Austrians, the Marquise de Berkenfield and her steward Hortensius stumble across the regiment. Sulpice recognizes the Marquise’s name from papers found near the infant Marie on the battlefield. The Marquise claims to be Marie’s aunt and resolves to take Marie away with her to give her a proper education. Marie has to leave behind her Regiment—and Tonio, who has enlisted in order to marry her.

ACT II
The Marquise plans to marry Marie to Duke Scipio of Krakentorp. Marie is not happy about this, or about her aunt’s attempts to train her to be a lady. She longs for the Regiment. To her delight, they rush in to see her. Tonio pleads with the Marquise to be allowed to marry Marie. When she refuses, he reveals that he knows that Marie is the Marquise’s illegitimate daughter. The Marquise and the formidable Duchesse de Krakentorp try to force Marie to sign her marriage contract. When Marie learns that the Marquise is her mother, she prepares to do so but is stopped by the Regiment, who come crashing in, led by Tonio. The Marquise decides she cannot make her daughter unhappy and gives Marie permission to marry Tonio after all. Everyone celebrates.

Donizetti’s Conquest

The critics panned the composer’s glittering comedy—but he won the hearts of Paris.

By Colin Jones

‘Monsieur Donizetti seems to treat us like a conquered country; it is a veritable invasion. One can no longer speak of the opera houses of Paris, but only of the opera houses of Monsieur Donizetti.’

Hector Berlioz’s newspaper review of the first performance of Donizetti’s The Daughter of the Regiment (La fille du régiment) at Paris’s Opéra-Comique on February 11, 1840 set the work in the context of the many other productions of the Italian’s operas then dominating the city’s houses. The carping and unpleasantly nationalistic note struck by the great French composer was echoed by other critics: The opera was facile and unconvincing, plagiarized, too noisy, too disjointed, too Italian (and for others, not Italian enough), merely a big “bag of candies,” and so on.

Happily, The Daughter of the Regiment survived this early barrage of criticism—in style. The French public disregarded Berlioz and his acolytes, warmly welcomed the Donizetti “invasion,” and was pleased to count itself among the Italian’s “conquests.” The sparkling opera was to become one of his most popular works in France over the course of the nineteenth century. From 1848, it entered the Opéra-Comique’s repertoire, and it stayed there until 1916. In 1914, on the eve of the World War I, it celebrated its 1,000th performance.

Part at least of The Daughter of the Regiment’s popularity across France, moreover, lay in its brazen display of patriotic national fervor. This was particularly evident in the stirringly militaristic “Salut à la France” (“Long live France”) sung by the eponymous heroine Marie, an orphan born to the sound of cannon-fire and adopted by France’s 21st “La France” Regiment. In the 1840s, the French government still associated Rouget de Lisle’s 1792 Marseillaise with rebels and critics. Before the Marseillaise was adopted as the official national anthem in 1879, festive national celebrations on July 14 often involved the performance of Marie’s “Salut à la France.” The custom declined (along with Donizetti’s reputation) in the early twentieth century, but in a notable exception, the Franco-American soprano Lily Pons sang the aria at the Metropolitan Opera in New York in 1941, draped in a tricolor flag bearing the Cross of Lorraine emblem that Charles de Gaulle’s Free French had adopted for national Resistance against the Nazis. It was the diva’s Casablanca moment.

Donizetti can hardly have imagined such a trajectory for what he called “his little opera,” but he certainly intended The Daughter of the Regiment to flatter French sensibilities and national pride. The Paris production of Lucia di Lammermoor in 1835 had brought him new commissions and the popularity in Paris that Berlioz so resented. But The Daughter of the Regiment was the first of his many operas to be world-premiered in the city, and the composer was aware that its success would consecrate his talent, crown his whole career, and open the road to fatter fees and more commissions. After all, Paris was the world capital of opera: The city boasted an enviable ensemble of opera houses and troupes, a very large, knowledgeable, and cultivated audience for opera, and a music press that offered dozens of informed reviews of new work. If composers or performers could make it there, it was generally held, they could make it anywhere. Donizetti had been angling for a Parisian commission from the mid-1830s. Though he remained a restless composer who, in the words of an admirer, “writes like a steam-engine and lives half his life in a coach,” the city remained his main operating base until his death in 1848.

Donizetti’s careerist calculation came off. His 1840 apotheosis elevated him to the status of Parisian celebrity; he was recognized in the street and received endless invitations from fashionable society. Among other successes, Lucrezia Borgia and his final triumph, Don Pasquale, followed. In time, he came to tire of “the courtesies, the dinners, the portraits, the plaster busts” of polite society, but the world he inhabited was altogether more salubrious than the drafty garrets of Puccini’s La Bohème. Moreover, after the peeved censorship that his work had incurred in conservative Naples, he also found the air of intellectual freedom for which Paris was famed refreshing and invigorating.

Donizetti soon recovered from any hurt he felt from the initial criticisms of The Daughter of the Regiment. He took heart from the fact that virtually all his reviewers, critical or otherwise, acknowledged that the opera lay outside the Italian protocols that had dominated Donizetti’s music thus far and was clearly recognizable as a genuine comic opera in the French style. That had been his aim—to make of the work, as one of his kinder reviewers noted, a successful application for French naturalization.

Donizetti chose as principals two young French singers at early stages in what would prove illustrious careers. Juliette Bourgeois (who had changed her name to Borghese while touring in Italy) played Marie, while the tenor Marié played Tonio, her Italian suitor. The choice proved only half-successful. Reviews were loud in praise of Borghese’s looks, voice, and acting, but united in panning Marié, who was said to have sung off-key all night. (It is interesting, if excruciating, to imagine quite how he mangled the eight high Cs in the “Ah! mes amis, quel jour de fête” aria for which the part has become famous.)

Donizetti’s strategizing over other aspects of the production was more effective. He employed two very experienced and highly rated librettists based in Paris, with an ear for changing public moods. They delivered him a risk-averse piece: a classic Romantic love affair, complete with Italianate color and the mandatory happy ending. Admittedly, The Daughter of the Regiment’s plot was lightweight and predictable. At the first night, the coup de théâtre by which Marie was revealed to be the daughter of the aristocratic villain of the piece was greeted by a heckler proclaiming, “That was obvious!”

But as Donizetti’s librettists knew, comic opera never lets predictability get in the way.

Donizetti also played to his audience’s prejudices by orienting the opera’s plot around past French military glories associated with the expansion of France in northern Italy under Napoleon’s First Empire (1804–15). This was all the more pertinent in that patriotism was very much in the air at that moment. An international crisis over Egypt in 1839–40 triggered a war scare that led the government to call up troops and fortify defenses around Paris. The Orleanist king Louis Philippe, set on the throne by the 1830 Revolution after the overthrow of the reactionary Bourbon dynasty, positioned himself as a liberal patriot, resisting conservative forces at home and abroad.

The year 1840 also witnessed a flaring up of pro-Napoleonic sentiment. Louis Philippe regarded Napoleon not as the creator of a rival dynasty but rather as a great French patriot and conqueror. The king sought to capitalize on the Napoleonic Legend that had grown up around the ex-Emperor since 1815. Lily Pons triumphed as Marie in the Met’s 1940/41 Season.
in ways that would buttress his own regime. To this end, he took the initiative of getting Britain to agree to the return of Napoleon's ashes from Saint-Helena where the British had confined him in his last years. In a hugely spectacular ceremony in December 1840, the ex-Emperor's remains were interred in the Invalides.

The setting of the hyper-nationalistic The Daughter of the Regiment in Napoleonic Italy had personal resonance for Donizetti: It was where the composer was born and bred. He was born in the city of Bergamo in 1797, a matter of months after it was incorporated into the pro-French Cisalpine Republic, one of the so-called “Sister Republics” that Napoleon had set up all over the Italian peninsula after his brilliant Italian campaigns of 1796–97. The region would later be incorporated into the kingdom of Italy, a key part of the transnational Napoleonic empire. In 1815, Donizetti’s elder brother volunteered (like Tyrolean Tonio in the opera) for service in Napoleon’s Grand Army.

Given these connections, Donizetti must have followed the return of Napoleon’s ashes with great interest. Reports of the day’s ceremonies highlighted the presence, wearing their old, threadbare uniforms, of many so-called grognards (“old grunters”), that is, veterans from Napoleonic armies. Since the 1820s, the grognard had become a stock type in the literature, popular songs, engravings, and caricatures that had burnished the Napoleonic Legend among the French people. Though still a serving officer, Donizetti’s Sulpice is very much in the literary grognard mode. Heroine Marie, for her part, was modelled on the related stereotype of the vivandière. Such women, selling troops tobacco, alcohol, and other petty commodities to supplement army rations, and adopting laundry and nursing duties, had a history going back well into the 17th century. But they were particularly numerous in the Napoleonic wars and reputed for acts of patriotic valor and devotion. Ex-vivandières rubbed shoulders with Napoleon’s grognards in the watching crowds.

Threatening to thwart Tonio and Marie’s happy ending are forces both international and domestic. On the one hand, the French army removes the heel of reactionary Austrian and Bavarians rulers—represented in the opera by the Germanic-sounding Marquise de Berkenfield—over the Italian peasantry. The latter warm to French conquerors who have brought them “land, culture, and equality,” and they look to benefit from the confiscation of aristocratic lands, including the Marquise’s manor-house. They feel comfortable with the fraternal, egalitarian backslapping of the French soldiery, which shocks the Marquise, who confesses to regarding as “nonsensical, absurd, and preposterous” the democratic ideal of the common people governing the state.

The conflict of values between the Tyrolean ruling classes and the French patriots is most clearly evidenced in the singing lesson that the Marquise administers to a very resistant Marie. The song at issue is not a Germanic Lied, moreover, but a French poem and melody. Yet it is of an out-of-date, whimsically artificial sort that Donizetti’s bourgeois opera audiences would have associated with the old French aristocracy. Music comes to mirror the Marquise’s progressively comical failure to produce a veneer of gentility in an increasingly rebellious Marie. The winsome simpering ditty is drowned out by the marches and fanfares of trumpets, trombones, and drum-rolls of the French nation in arms. The music thus underlines the moral: Following one’s heart is always to be preferred to social promotion into the hide-bound aristocracy, and a noble heart will always trump a noble escutcheon. So Marie gives up high heels for army boots, abandoning her German, aristocratic, and anti-democratic mother so as to remain under the protection of her adoptive father, the 21st “La France” Regiment—and thus, more broadly, of her fatherland.

With The Daughter of the Regiment, Donizetti gave the French public what he thought it would like to hear, as a shrewd but effective means of ensuring his own Parisian consecration. It showed a receptive audience that French patriotism could be seen and felt and sung—and all the better in the context of a successful love story. In that respect, Donizetti took a leaf out of the book of an earlier itinerant composer keen to make his mark in the Parisian opera world, namely, Mozart. In The Marriage of Figaro as in The Daughter of the Regiment, “tout finit par des chansons”—a fact that all lovers of happy endings and great operas will strongly approve.

With major support provided from the Nancy W. Knowles Student and Family Performances Fund

During her lifetime, Carol Fox Award recipient Nancy Knowles generously invested her time, talents, and leadership to advance Lyric through her membership on the Board of Directors, Executive Committee, and the Guild Board. In recognition of her extraordinary gift to the Campaign for Excellence, Lyric named the Nancy W. Knowles Lobby in 2007. Later, Nancy made a significant gift in support of the Breaking New Ground Campaign, creating the Nancy W. Knowles Student and Family Performances Fund, which she secured by including Lyric as a beneficiary of her estate—a remarkable continuation of her lifetime generosity. Lyric will forever be grateful for Nancy’s extraordinary generosity and for creating a fund through her thoughtful gift planning that will support children and family programming at Lyric for years to come.

*Future Planned Gift These donors have named Lyric in their will, trust, IRA, or other planned giving possibilities to establish an endowment fund in their name to support Lyric, its programs, and positions forever. Learn how to leave a lasting legacy by contacting Mike Biver, Senior Director of Gift Planning, at 312.827.5655 or email mbiver@lyricopera.org.
“Lyric has been a special part of my life for over fifty years. Not being a person of great means, I always gave modestly with my subscription renewal. I wanted to do more—that’s why I decided to make a planned gift to Lyric.”

To keep opera a must-see, must-hear experience, the art form needs outstanding artists who can convey through singing and acting the emotional range and engaging storytelling that are opera’s hallmarks. Lyric, through The Patrick G. and Shirley W. Ryan Opera Center, identifies exceptionally talented emerging artists from around the world and provides them with comprehensive training and performance opportunities. On the world’s stages, the Center’s impressive roster of alumni continually proves the value of training at Lyric.

Appearances this season: Giorgio Germont/ La traviata, Welsh National Opera; Zurga/ Les pêcheurs de perles, Vlaamse Opera.

“My first mainstage role while in the Ryan Opera Center was the Herald in Handel’s Rinaldo, alongside Marilyn Horne and Sam Ramey, who sang Argante and was the inspiration for my own portrayal of the role at Teatro alla Scala (see photo), just after my debut there as Escamillo in Carmen (whose aria I first sang for Sherrill Milnes in an Opera Center master class). Also during my tenure, I agreed to take on an extra understudy assignment, and this led to my first contract with the Metropolitan Opera. Thanks to the marvelous opportunities presented to me by Lyric’s exceptional training program, I have been able to achieve great career successes—and for that, I am very thankful.”

Growing and Growing

Entering its seventh year, the Empower Youth! program continues to thrive—and a dance mentor helps lead the way

By David Zivan

When it comes to Empower Youth!, a program of Lyric Unlimited, the company’s learning and creative engagement division, Tanji Harper has seen it all—quite literally. The Chicago-based choreographer, dancer, and educator has been a dance mentor with the program since it launched six years ago. From the first large-scale, student-driven productions, through the complex pivots necessitated by the pandemic, to today, Harper has been an energizing force for the initiative and its participants. Perhaps most remarkably, as the seventh year began this fall, Harper’s enthusiasm was undiminished. “I’ve been here since the beginning, and it is my favorite job,” she says. “It’s really life changing for the young people who are involved.”

The core mission of Empower Youth! is “to ignite creativity through the arts.” In partnership with the Chicago Urban League, the program encourages and guides Black Chicago teens in the creation of an original production drawn from the stories of their lives and how they deal with issues pertinent to them. Participants work with professional artistic staff and facilitators to learn how principles of performance, the written word, theater, music, and dance can translate to their everyday lives—and also they see up-close how the arts offer numerous, sometimes unexpected career paths. The Urban League helps find the cohort through its partnerships with various schools around the city. More than a century old, the organization extends its impact with the students outside the program as well, offering resources for post-secondary options and opportunities; alums of the Empower Youth! program are already an accomplished set.

Since returning to fully in-person programming following the worst of the pandemic, there has been a notable increase in both the number of participants and their commitment to the program. After 22 teens finished the program last year, applications for this year exceeded 30 well before the deadline. “I think that has a lot to do with [teens] being cooped up and not having many options to do live practice and to be around other like-minded individuals that they don’t necessarily see every single day,” Harper notes. “Another aspect of why this is so cool, and why it works, is because they get to meet different people from different schools. And they get to work with working professionals—a chance to bounce their ideas off of people who make art for a living.”

Harper’s deep ties to the community make her a truly effective artist partner for Lyric Opera of Chicago. A South Side native, Harper trained locally with the Joseph Holmes Chicago Dance Theatre, Joel Hall, and elsewhere, and graduated from The Chicago Academy of the Arts. She danced professionally on both coasts and toured with major national acts before returning to Chicago and starting a teaching career.

She currently teaches a class on hip-hop in all its facets at Harold Washington College, and for the past two decades has been the artistic director of The Happiness Club, a free performing arts education program for Chicago youths aged 8 to 18. The group has performed all over the city, including at Lollapalooza and at halftime during a Bulls game. “Happiness Club is sort of like the Mickey Mouse club,” Harper jokes. “They had stage performances and sang pop songs. They did covers. We don’t do covers, really. We create our own music and write our own songs and then we go around and perform them.”

Harper first connected with Lyric for its Chicago Voices project, where her troupe was selected to perform at the Harris Theater (“One of the craziest, most amazing things I’ve ever done,” she says), and then she was invited to be part of piloting EmpowerYouth!. Several cast members of Lyric’s world premiere last season of The Factotum had studied with Harper. Perhaps most notably, one former member of The Happiness Club, Zoie Reams, was one of the principal artists in Lyric’s other world premiere last season, Proximity.

Harper gave two well-received and highly personal pre-show talks for that opera. “That was a lovely, nerve-wracking thing,” she says. “It was a huge opportunity that they gave me, and I really appreciated it because it tested my limits. See, Lyric is one of those organizations that I just don’t say no to because every single time they ask me to do something, it always turns out great.”

Empower Youth! seems to be one of those things—something created from the ground up that is poised for more growth. “Another reason this program continues to elevate and be successful is because we’re always looking at what we could have done better, or where we could have been more efficient,” Harper says. “Everybody involved on the Lyric staff just keeps working harder to make the program that much better for the young people. We all just keep showing up for each other, and it makes the job so easy. It does not feel like work.”

Indeed, improvements planned for this new session look unusually promising. While the total engagement time for the students has not changed significantly, the cadence has evolved to a series of Saturday sessions leading up to the finale that will provide more frequent interaction with the artist mentors.

This year, Empower Youth! has partnered with Kennedy-King College, which is expected to yield numerous benefits. Working in university environments goes a long way to getting students more comfortable and familiar with those settings. As much as the program is highly focused on process and collaboration, it always culminates in a performance, and this session’s schedule provides significantly more time in the university’s theater.

“It’s so much fun to expose young people to the possibilities of doing art in this way. To have the support of adults who know what they’re doing is all young people need,” Harper says. “They need a door, they need the resource, they need the mentor, they need the adult to care. That’s it. And once they have that, they’re unstoppable.”
What is your role here at Lyric?
I work on anything that’s in the Artistic department, but not Artistic itself. For instance, all the stuff that happens after somebody has been cast: What has to happen in order for them to get here? A majority of my job is dealing with contracts—creating them, moving them, making sure that Company Management has the information they need in order to track overtime and fittings and to arrange for flights. If an artist has never worked in the U.S. before, I take them to the Social Security office.

What was your path to working here?
Technically I started in February 2008, working in the ticketing department while I was at Columbia College. After I graduated, I had several other jobs, but I still kept coming back, doing evening and weekend performances. I did internships with the Development department, and one with the Ryan Opera Center, and then I was a tour manager for Opera in the Neighborhoods for a couple of seasons. And then this position became available, and I was glad I hadn’t moved forward in those other departments. This is the best fit for me. Organizing things is not so fun for a lot of people, but I’m a person who would regularly take out all her CDs and decide I want to organize them a different way and do that.

What was your first opera?
My first week here, my supervisor found out that I’d never actually seen an opera, and she said, No—that’s not acceptable. There was a Carmen performance that afternoon, and she said, Go watch. So Carmen in the Lyric Opera House was my very first opera experience. It kind of set a high bar.

Do you have a favorite now?
I know it’s a weird one, but I saw Lulu three times when it was here. I know it’s extremely long and the music is not everyone’s cup of tea, but I think because I studied music and music theory, I have an appreciation for how it’s structured. I really enjoy listening to it and following where it’s going. So that is definitely my favorite drama. But Die Fledermus has a soft place in my heart because I think it’s so funny. It just makes me laugh so much.

What else do you do for fun?
The other thing I spend a lot of time doing is I’m also a professional DJ. I don’t DJ full time anymore, but I used to do 70 gigs a year, and that was my main source of income. I’ve slowed down a lot, but I still like to do events because it’s a fun way to balance being here doing operational spreadsheets and database monitoring.

Any favorite Lyric moment?
When I was working on the tours with Opera in the Neighborhoods, we would sometimes have 15 kids for one show, and 1,500 for the next. Getting them in and out was a little bit crazy, but I always liked seeing these little third graders in their opera attire, all dressed up and so excited, and they would give me high fives. It was amazing to see a younger generation getting introduced to and getting excited about opera. Also: seeing Twilight Gods happen. It was something that nobody had ever done before. I feel that at Lyric, a tier one opera house, you get more experimentation than you would expect.
